When the handicap of absoate reliance on cotton is removed, and when the southern people have letermined upon meeting the needs of home consumption with home production, their greatest economic problem, if not entirely solved, is well on its way towards solution.

Not in its entire history outh seen so clearly as it does today a way to industrial freedom. The ew as well as the old south has until recently been magnificent staple That which should have been a beneit has been a detriment because i ias been allowed to restrict energy and enterprise, to stand in the way development along lines that romised immediately greater reurns. It can be said of cotton in south, as has been said of many ther things in human experience hat while it is a splendid servant, i as been a very poor master. The both had only to put it in its propr place in order to prove the truth f his beyond cavil.

That part of the union in point of cal development is only in its inancy. In many respects it is as ow as was the west at the close of he civil war. It calls for increased ransportation facilities and the pronotion of industries that will turn its raw materials into finished articles at home. Wonderfully fertile, rich beyond calculation in timber and minerals, the idle capital of the nation, seeking profitable employment, can find opportunities for investment in the south equal to those held out by any other part of the country.

There is more Catarrh in this section of the country than all other discusses put together, and until the last few years was supposed to be incurable. For a great many years doctors
